On any given day through the 1960s and '70s, Irving and Ruth Karp could be found at their business, Carnival Fruit, chatting with customers as the couple sold oranges for a penny apiece.

Their successful produce company stood as a community staple for decades, its colorful trucks circling Miami's streets.

After they sold the company, the Karps turned to philanthropy, donating tens of thousands of dollars to the University of Miami and other organizations.

They found friendship through a Holocaust

On Monday, Irving Karp died at home after he fell, said his son Martin Karp, a Miami-Dade School Board member. He was 94.

Karp and his wife, Ruth, first came to South Florida as newlyweds. After marrying in New York in 1946, they honeymooned in South Beach, driving down in a car nearly a decade old that kept breaking down every few miles. They stayed at the Cleveland Hotel for $21 a week — and fell in love with the area.

When he came back to the U.S. and married, he already had a reputation as a good businessman and produce salesman, said his wife Ruth, 93.

“He was putting everybody out of business, even his mother and father,” she said.

What started as a retail produce store in Miami Beach with a single 1.5-ton pickup truck grew to a fleet of more than 70 trucks that distributed produce wholesale mostly across South Florida and the Caribbean, including the Cayman Islands and the Bahamas.

Even as Carnival Fruit grew, it stayed a mom-and-pop business, with their employees feeling more like relatives, Ruth Karp said.

“Everybody was one of the family. They used to call him ‘Hey Irving.’ They called me ‘Ms. Ruth.’ I got the respect,” she said.

Son Martin said his father’s devotion to his work and family was unparalleled.

“He just led by example,” he said. “It was a matter of getting up 3 in the morning, 4 in the morning, getting into the warehouse, coming home late afternoon and being with family.”

Irving retired in 1984, his son said, and the company dissolved in 2009, according to the state’s Division of Corporations.
